For those who believe America's bohemianism began in the 1960s, this biography of Edna St. Vincent Millay serves as a powerful corrective. Possessed of an electric personality and a highly original poetic voice, Millay burst on the bohemian scene in 1917 with her poem "Renaissance", went to Vassar on the financial support of her poetry's admirers, and made another grand entrance into bohemia upon her arrival in Greenwich Village. Her sexuality was as incandescent as her poetry. She smoked in public, took many lovers (men and women, single and married), flouted convention sensationally, and became the embodiment of the New Woman. She was known for her ardent bisexuality and for the extraordinary number of sexual partners she took. She left such figures as Edmund Wilson begging for favors. Nancy Milford was gotten unprecedented access to Millay's letters and journals, and this is the first authorized and authoritative Millay biography.
