The following pages owe their origin to one of those strange interpositions of Divine Providence, by which man is often unexpectedly and solemnly tamed from his purpose. The Author had completed his arrangements for a sea-voyage, when the sudden and alarming illness of a beloved relative interposed to prevent its accomplishment. A period of much anxiety ensued, during which the idea and the themes of this little volume suggested themselves to his mind. Too oppressed to resume the composition of a larger work on a graver subject, which he had commenced, he found it more soothing to allow his thoughts to flow in the simple channel which his own feelings naturally dictated.
